Children may experience multiple types of exposure to domestic violence, with nearly all exposed children being direct eyewitnesses to at least some violence in the home.

As per the DOJ, eyewitness accounts for 65 to 86 percent of all exposure. Nine out of ten children who are exposed to physical intimate partner violence in their lifetimes are eyewitnesses.

In the same DOJ report, approximately half of children yell at their parents during a violent episode between the parents or try to get away; nearly a quarter call for help at least once.

Children react to exposure to domestic violence in different ways, and many children show remarkable resilience. However, children exposed are often physically, mentally, and emotionally impacted.

In a comprehensive national survey of children's exposure to violence, the DOJ notes the following:

- They may suffer from difficulties with attachment, regressive behavior, anxiety and depression, and aggression and conduct problems.
- · They may be more prone to dating violence, delinquency, further victimization, and involvement with the child welfare and juvenile justice systems.
- Being exposed to violence may impair a child's capacity for partnering and parenting later in life, continuing the cycle of violence into the next generation.
